U.S. Shies Away From Threats In Plane Standoff With China

Ties Too Complex for Unilateral Steps, Aides Say

By DAVID E. SANGER

WASHINGTON, April 9 — President Bush's senior advisers have concluded for now that the most severe acts of retaliation they could threaten in the spy-plane standoff with China — selling advanced arms to Taiwan, restricting trade, derauling Beijing's bid for the Olympics — would not speed the release of the 24 American crew members and could harm longer-term interests in Asia, administration officials said.

One official involved in the first review of those options said today together, "Much of the good they talked about can go wrong, or will go wrong," if the standoff continues, Mr. Fleischer said.

But American officials acknowledge that neither side has much room to inflict harm on the other, unless they are willing to make major diplomatic and economic sacrifices.

"The reality is that the Chinese hold the short-term tactical cards, because they have the crew, and we hold the long-term strategic cards,"
